Artistry of Tibtett Wins Praise of New York Critics

Lawrence Tibtett, scheduled to appear in the last night of the socialist capital Monday evening, November 21, in a large capacity over America over the air. Just as he sprang into fame with "Horse Country," singing Tibtett conquered his second advent in telling pictures. None of Tibtett's silent debut is "The Beg"; after his amazing talent, was telegraphed through the entire city and teleprint to Europe. New York declared him, "the greatest actor since the motion pictures since the advent of D'Urville." Reversing this making-of-motion picture story, "The New Man".

Stones Triumph

NEW RECORD IS SET AT LIBRARY

The Lawrence College library experienced the greatest daily circulation in its history on November 21. The library was opened at 8 a.m. on that day, and remained open until 8:30 p.m. The number of books checked out during the day was 150, which is the highest daily circulation ever recorded. The previous record was set on November 18, 1933, when 140 books were checked out. The increase in circulation is due to the increased use of the library by students, faculty, and staff.

New books and periodicals were purchased for the library, and the shelves were rearranged to accommodate the increased number of books. The library staff worked overtime to process the new materials and keep the shelves stocked.

Coeds Should Not Make Plenty of Time for Their Appointment.

It is expounded that the fact that foreign language is essential to graduate work is an adequate justification for requiring its study by the entering group. There is no doubt that foreign language is of great importance in the pursuit of graduate activities. However, with due respect for the validity of this argument, there are objections to the present policy.

In the first place, comparatively few freshmen know, at the time of entrance, whether or not they are going on with graduate work, and to anything of knowing the field in which they will eventually specialize. This lack of knowledge inevitably handicaps them in their choice of a language for such use. Confusing speculations for the moment to the utilitarian aspect of foreign language, it becomes a part of the specialized activities of the whole undergraduate body. Why not continue to the end of their remaining years of college until the rest of his specialization is started? Study in his junior and senior years should give him the essentials for graduate work in two languages if necessary. At present the boy who desires to take a foreign language is required to make his choice before the rest of his specialization is started. If he college environment has functioned properly, by the time he is considered able to make a major subject, he should be expected to make a dependable choice regarding foreign language study. So, from the standpoint of its use as a tool in graduate work, the requirement, in itself, is of little value.

In the second place, it seems that we may be placing too much importance on the help which foreign language offers in graduate work. Although the Wharton school, which is connected with the University of Pennsylvania, was asked to express their judgment as to the importance which should be attached to eight different foreign languages, they gave only 3.2 per cent., and of subordinate importance and doubtful value, in 52 per cent. of the replies. "Foreign languages received an average rating much below any of the other fields." Such results tend toward the conclusion that the above mentioned reason, namely, use in graduate study, does not constitute an adequate justification for requiring the pursuit of foreign language on the part of the undergraduate.

Those who advance the argument with the reply that one may take a Ph.D. degree and escape the foreign language requirement, must first justify the traditional discrimination in favor of the R.A. degree. Otherwise, one may take advantage of the choice between two degrees, one of which is looked on favorably, when the chief reason for distinction between the two is not based on factual ground. Why then not be availing to take the "radical" step of abolition of the Ph.B. degree, and having only one degree involving no inadequately justified requirements. Such a system, it seems to us, would be more to the benefit of each individual, just, and would be more in keeping with a sound educational policy.

At a recent meeting of the intercollegiate sports council, new volleyball rules were made and old rules clarified in preparation for the Greek volleyball tournament which will begin this week. A definite time limit was fixed in which a game must be played, and a player who-game is over will be deemed at fault. If a game is over, the team which demands a postponement must therefore be notified. If the team which demands the postponement fails to notice the other team, the game will be played and the match will be determined as if it were played in its entirety.

Marxell House Ways to Serve Musical Interests of Children

F. A. James R. Marxell of the education department of the University of Wisconsin, has spoken in the schools of the nation. He pointed out that public school music has developed all over the United States on a very large scale, and that there are not only the enthusiastic support of school officials everywhere, but also the interest of the general public.

The speaker commented several of the ways in which schools can serve the musical interests of children, the most important being teaching them to sing. An extensive instrumental course is also necessary if the musical opportunities afforded by a school system are to be considered adequate.

In concluding the address, Professor Marxell pointed out that "one should never be satisfied with anything but the music program of the school, which must always be improved, as the needs of the community change. It is also essential that the instrumental course be continued, as it is one of the best ways to teach children to sing."

May Improve Our Appreciation

In his speech presented Monday morning, Professor Marxell indicated several ways in which musical appreciation could be improved in our schools. He suggested that the appreciation of music be given more importance in the public schools, that it be taught in a more systematic manner, and that it be given more emphasis in the curriculum.

It was alleged that the ability to listen is not always evident in the younger students, but may be developed during the elementary grades. It was also suggested that the appreciation of music be given more importance in the public schools, that it be taught in a more systematic manner, and that it be given more emphasis in the curriculum.
